INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE[1]

Amici curiae are 12 former federal judges (one of whom was the Director of the FBI) and 13 former senior officials in the United States Department of Justice. Please see the attached Appendix for a list of the amici, along with biographical information for each one. Amici are interested in this case because of their years of dedicated service to the United States and their commitment to the Constitution and the rule of law. Amici are gravely concerned about the Fourth Circuit's decision in this case, which permits the government to seize and indefinitely imprison anyone in this country, citizens and non-citizens alike, without the procedural protections provided in criminal prosecutions.

The Fourth Circuit's decision rests on the premise that the "war on terror" justifies deviation from settled principles of due process, and that the Executive Branch should be permitted to arrest within the United States and to detain indefinitely without charge or trial, anyone—even a legal alien or United States citizen—whom it alleges to be an "enemy combatant." We emphatically reject that premise. Those who plan terrorist acts should be tried and, if guilty as charged, convicted in a court of law. Indeed, in many cases in recent years, the criminal justice system has been used to effectively prosecute people accused of committing or planning to commit acts of terrorism within the United States. Based on their many years of experience, amici are knowledgeable about the tools prosecutors possess, the ability of the federal courts to handle cases involving classified evidence, and the effectiveness of the criminal justice system to prosecute alleged terrorists and protect American citizens.

[1] Pursuant to Rule 37.6, amici affirm that no counsel for a party authored this brief in whole or in part and that no person other than amici and their counsel made a monetary contribution to its preparation or submission. Counsel of record for all parties received timely notice under Rule 37.2(a) of the intent of amici to file this brief. The parties' letters consenting to the filing of this brief have been filed with the Clerk's office.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In this extraordinary case, the Fourth Circuit has held that the government has the power to arrest and imprison indefinitely anyone in the United States whom the government suspects of being a potential terrorist, without the normal procedural protections found in the criminal justice system. Most disturbing, the Fourth Circuit's decision applies fully to United States citizens; under the Fourth Circuit's rationale, American citizens may be imprisoned indefinitely merely upon suspicion of being linked in some way to potential terrorism.

This unprecedented expansion of Executive authority within the borders of the United States is not only at odds with more than 200 years of history, but it is wholly unnecessary. The United States criminal justice system is well-equipped to prosecute those accused of planning or committing terrorist acts; in recent years, the United States has successfully prosecuted many terrorists in the federal courts. In addition, the Classified Information Procedures Act ("CIPA"), 18 U.S.C. app. 3 §§ 1-16, and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act ("FISA"), 50 U.S.C. § 1801 et seq., provide effective tools that courts have used to manage terrorism prosecutions and the foreign intelligence and classified information often present in such cases.

It is essential that this Court review the Fourth Circuit's decision, which permits the government to forego the criminal process and instead implement a regime of indefinite Executive detention. As long as that ruling stands, it will be a grave threat to the civil liberties of American citizens, an omnipresent cudgel that may be wielded by the Executive Branch at its discretion against anyone suspected of posing a potential threat.

ARGUMENT

THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM IS WELL EQUIPPED TO PROSECUTE PEOPLE ACCUSED OF PLANNING OR COMMITTING TERRORIST ACTS.

This is an extraordinary case. The Fourth Circuit has held that the government has the power to arrest and imprison indefinitely anyone in the United States whom the government suspects of being a potential terrorist, without the normal procedural protections found in the criminal justice system. (In this case, for example, al-Marri was held incommunicado for 16 months without access to his attorneys after the government dismissed the criminal charges against him and decided to detain him as an "enemy combatant" instead. Pet. 4.) Moreover, the unprecedented power granted to the government by the Fourth Circuit's decision applies not only to non-citizens seized in this country, but to American citizens as well.

Unless the Fourth Circuit's decision is overturned, we are gravely concerned that indefinite imprisonment of individuals within the United States will become increasingly common—that the government will choose to avoid criminal prosecutions and the protections associated with them, such as the defendant's right to counsel, the right to hear all of the evidence offered against him, the right to confront witnesses, and the government's obligation to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Moreover, we are concerned with the appearance in this case that the government may have subjected al-Marri to indefinite military detention in order to interrogate him outside the "strictures of criminal process." Pet. App. 54a n.19 (Motz, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The Government's recent admission in other litigation that it has subjected al-Marri to repeated interrogation during his imprisonment in the Naval Brig would seem to substantiate al-Marri's contention" that he is being detained indefinitely for interrogation outside the criminal justice system). As Justice O'Connor wrote for the plurality in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 521 (2004), "indefinite detention for the purpose of interrogation is not authorized." See also Rumsfeld v. Padilla, 542 U.S. 426, 465 (2004) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (executive detention is not "justified by the naked interest in using unlawful procedures to extract information. Incommunicado detention for months on end is such a procedure . . . . For if this Nation is to remain true to the ideals symbolized by its flag, it must not wield the tools of tyrants even to resist an assault by the forces of tyranny").

The Fourth Circuit's decision is especially troubling because the animating force underlying it—the notion that indefinite executive detention is the only means of preventing alleged terrorist activity—is demonstrably false. Congress has enacted a wide variety of statutes that may be used to effectively prosecute suspected terrorists. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 2384 (conspiring to overthrow, make war or oppose by force the government of the United States); 18 U.S.C. § 2339A (criminalizing the provision of "material support or resources" to terrorist organizations including concealing or disguising the source or ownership of material support or resources); 18 U.S.C. § 2332B (criminalizing "acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries"); 18 U.S.C. § 2339C (prohibiting conduct that "directly or indirectly" provides funds with the knowledge that such funds will be used to carry out terrorist activities). In addition to the ample statutory resources that exist for charging and prosecuting terrorist activity, CIPA and FISA provide effective tools that courts have used to manage terrorism prosecutions.

A. The Criminal Justice System Has Repeatedly Proven Its Effectiveness In Prosecuting Alleged Terrorists.

The criminal justice system has repeatedly demonstrated its ability to prosecute terrorism cases:

1. In a series of related cases, 17 individuals were convicted of planning and executing the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, conspiring to bomb United States commercial airliners in Southeast Asia, and engaging in a seditious conspiracy "to wage a war of urban terrorism against the United States and forcibly to oppose its authority." United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88, 104 (2d Cir. 1999); see also United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003); United States v. Salameh, 152 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1998) (all affirming convictions). Among the charges for which the Rahman defendants were convicted were seditious conspiracy, attempted bombing, a variety of firearms charges, and several counts of murder, attempted murder and conspiracy to commit murder (including the attempted murder of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and the murder of Rabbi Meir Kahane). 189 F.3d at 104.

2. Iyman Faris was charged with, and ultimately pleaded guilty to, conspiring with other members of al Qaeda to destroy the Brooklyn Bridge. United States v. Faris, 162 F. App'x 199 (4th Cir. 2005) (affirming Faris's conviction and 20-year sentence).

3. Seven young men dubbed the "Portland Seven" were apprehended in 2002 and charged with various counts of conspiracy; one fled the country for Afghanistan, where he was killed in battle, while the other six pleaded guilty and received prison sentences. Mitch Frank, Terror Goes on Trial, TIME, Mar. 7, 2005, at 34; Jack Epstein & Johnny Miller, The Record in Court of U.S. Charges Brought Against Terrorism Suspects by the Justice Department, S.F. CHRONICLE, Sept. 17, 2004, at A3.

4. Six men from New York State who came to be known as "The Lackawanna Six" were charged with providing material assistance to a terrorist organization after they traveled to Afghanistan to train and meet with Osama bin Laden; all six entered guilty pleas and were sentenced to prison terms. John J. Goldman, First "Lackawanna Six" Sentencing, L.A. TIMES, Dec. 4, 2003, at A20.

5. On December 22, 2001, Richard Reid was arrested for trying to destroy an airplane with explosives embedded in his shoes. He later pleaded guilty to various terrorism-related offenses including: attempted use of a weapon of mass destruction, 18 U.S.C. § 2332a(a)(1); placing an explosive device on board an aircraft, and interfering with an airline flight crew and attendants, 49 U.S.C. § 46504; and attempted destruction of an aircraft, 18 U.S.C. § 32(a). United States v. Reid, 369 F.3d 619, 619 n.1 (1st Cir. 2004). He was sentenced to life in prison. Id. at 619-20.

6. United States citizen John Walker Lindh was apprehended in Afghanistan and ultimately pleaded guilty to charges that included assisting al Qaeda and carrying explosive devices. He received a 20-year sentence. United States v. Lindh, 227 F. Supp. 2d 565 (E.D. Va. 2002).

7. In 2006, the government indicted seven suspected terrorists, including the group's leader, Narseal Batiste, who were arrested in Florida for allegedly plotting to destroy the Sears Tower. United States v. Batiste, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 61186 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 21, 2007). They have been charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §§ 2339B (providing material support to terrorists), 2339A (providing material support or resources to designated foreign terrorist organizations), 844(n) (conspiracy to import, manufacture, distribute and store explosive materials), and 2384 (treason, sedition and subversive activities). Id. One of the defendants was acquitted and now faces deportation to Haiti. Luis F. Perez, Cleared Man May Be Deported, SUN-SENTINEL, Aug. 25, 2008, at 6B. A third trial is set for the remaining defendants in January 2009 after two mistrials. Vanessa Blum, Third Liberty City Trial Set for January; New Lawyers Get Time To Prepare, SUN-SENTINEL, May 1, 2008, at 2B.

8. Ahmed Omar Abu Ali was arrested in Saudi Arabia and transferred to the United States, where he was prosecuted for joining al Qaeda and participating in plans to commit terrorist acts within the United States. United States v. Abu Ali, 395 F. Supp. 2d 338, 341 (E.D. Va. 2005). He was sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment after being convicted of nine counts, including providing material support and resources to a designated foreign terrorist organization in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2339B, conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2339A, and receiving funds and services from al Qaeda in violation of 50 U.S.C. § 1705(b); 31 C.F.R. § 595.204. United States v. Abu Ali, 2006 U.S. Dist. Lexis 29461, at *2 n.1, *20 (E.D. Va. Apr. 17, 2006). The Fourth Circuit recently affirmed his conviction and remanded to the district court for resentencing on the ground that the district court's significant downward departure from the sentencing guidelines was unjustified. United States v. Abu Ali, 528 F.3d 210, 269 (4th Cir. 2008).

9. Ali al-Timimi, an Islamic scholar and alleged member of the Virginia Jihad network, who encouraged young men to travel to foreign training camps and join the Taliban to fight the United States, was sentenced to life in prison after a jury convicted him of conspiracy, attempting to aid the Taliban, soliciting treason, soliciting others to wage war against the United States, and aiding and abetting the use of firearms and explosives. Eric Lichtblau, Scholar Is Given Life Sentence in 'Virginia Jihad' Case, N.Y. TIMES, July 14, 2005, at A21.

10. Rafiq Sabir, a doctor living in Florida, and Tarik Shah were charged with conspiring to provide martial arts training and medical assistance to al-Qaeda in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2339B. Sabir was convicted and sentenced to 25 years in prison following a five-week jury trial. United States v. Sabir, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 77952 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 15, 2007). Shah pleaded guilty to all charges and was sentenced to 15 years in prison on November 7, 2007. Press Release, United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, Bronx Martial Arts Instructor Sentenced to 15 Years in Prison for Conspiring to Provide Material Support to Al-Qaeda (Nov. 7, 2007).

11. Al-Qaeda member Christopher Paul met repeatedly with terrorist leaders in Pakistan and Afghanistan over the course of fifteen years and received weapons training from them. United States v. Paul, No. 2:07-cr-00087-GLF (S.D. Ohio June 6, 2008). The Ohio resident pleaded guilty in June 2008 to conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction against European and United States targets, and was sentenced to 20 years in prison. Id.

12. Yassin Aref and Mohanmmad Hossain, two Albany mosque leaders, were convicted of a money laundering conspiracy to provide material support to a terrorist organization in a case involving a scheme to use a missile in an attack on New York City. The Second Circuit recently affirmed their convictions and held that the district court properly sealed certain classified documents in their trials. United States v. Aref, 533 F.3d 72, 83 (2d Cir. 2008).

13. A jury found a former member of the United States Navy, Hassan Abu-Jihaad, guilty of providing material support to terrorists and disclosing classified national defense information as part of a conspiracy to kill United States citizens in March 2008. United States v. Hassan, No. 3:07-cr-57-MRK (D. Conn. Mar. 5, 2008).

B. CIPA Equips Courts To Effectively Manage Classified Material In Terrorism Prosecutions.

The Classified Information Procedures Act is an important statutory tool that provides sound procedures for courts to effectively manage classified information at issue in terrorism prosecutions. The criminal justice system's record of effectively managing classified information without security breaches reinforces the conclusion that our criminal justice system is more than able to deal with terrorism prosecutions.

CIPA contains the following central features:

- The government may seek a protective order to prevent disclosure of classified information provided to a defendant in a trial. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 § 3.
- The defendant must provide the court and government with written notice that he intends to use classified information. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 § 5.
- The court is authorized to determine the relevance and admissibility of all classified information, including any classified information requested by the defendant. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 §§ 4 & 6(a). The government may request a hearing for the court to make such a determination; that hearing may be held in camera upon a proper showing that a public hearing would disclose the classified information. Id. § 6(a).
- The statute also provides alternative procedures the court may use for addressing classified information where the court authorizes its disclosure, such as redacting classified portions of documents or allowing for a substitution such as a statement admitting the relevant facts or a summary of the classified information. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 § 6(c)(1). In response to a court's decision to authorize disclosure of classified information (or its substitute), the Attorney General may submit an affidavit "certifying that disclosure of classified information would cause identifiable damage to the national security of the United States. If so requested by the United States, the court shall examine such affidavit in camera and ex parte." Id. § 6(c)(2). The court may also seal or close the proceedings. Id. § 6(d) & (f).

- CIPA provides for immediate appeal of the district court's decisions regarding the admission or exclusion of classified information. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 § 7.
- Section 8 provides procedures to deal with classified information at trial, such as admitting only a portion of documents or evidence and taking further precautions with the witnesses' testimony to avoid disclosure of classified information. 18 U.S.C. app. 3 § 8.

CIPA has been an effective tool in terrorism prosecutions. It enables courts to protect national security interests, while at the same time establishing fair procedures that permit the prosecution of persons accused of planning or committing terrorist acts. Judges with CIPA experience "speak of it as a reasonable compromise between fairness and security." Kenneth Roth, After Guantanamo: The Case Against Preventative Detention, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, May/June 2008, at 9. Judge Coughenour, who presided over the Millennium Bomber trial in 2001, noted that CIPA "played a prominent role during the trial," and that "the act's extensive protections [were] more than adequate." John C. Coughenour, The Right Place to Try Terrorism Cases, WASH. POST, July 27, 2008, at B7. Indeed, a recent study concludes that "CIPA has provided a flexible, practical mechanism for problems posed by classified evidence," citing at least eighteen terrorism cases where CIPA has been employed successfully. Richard B. Zabel & James J. Benjamin, Jr., IN PURSUIT OF JUSTICE: PROSECUTING TERRORISM CASES IN FEDERAL COURTS 85 (May 2008), available at humanrightsfirst.org. See also, e.g., Abu Ali, 528 F.3d at 250-55 (affirming convictions for terrorism-related offenses and explaining in detail how the district court "appropriately balanced" the interests of the government in protecting national security interests and the defendant's right to a fair trial).[2]

[2] In his opinion below, Judge Wilkinson cited two instances of alleged disclosures to support his view that our criminal justice system is not up to the task of prosecuting those accused of terrorism without imposing a dangerous security risk. Pet. App. 214a-219a (Wilkinson, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) (citing Michael B. Mukasey, Jose Padilla Makes Bad Law, Wall St. J., Aug. 22, 2007, at A15). First, Judge Wilkinson referenced the prosecution of Omar Adel Rahman, in which the government's list of unindicted co-conspirators was turned over to the defendant, and reportedly reached Osama bin Laden in Khartoum shortly thereafter; second, Judge Wilkinson referred to testimony given during the trial of Ramzi Yousef, the mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombings, that Indeed, Patrick Fitzgerald, the prosecutor in the case arising out of the bombings of the American embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, has commented that "[w]hen you see how much classified information was involved in that case, and when you see that there weren't any leaks, you get pretty darn confident that the federal courts are capable of handling these prosecutions. I don't think people realize how well our system can work in protecting classified information." Serrin Turner & Stephen J. Schulhofer, The Secrecy Problem in Terrorism Trials 25 (2005) (quoting a November 29, 2004 consultation with Patrick Fitzgerald).

allegedly helped terrorists discover that one of their communications links had been compromised.

In both cases, however, the government apparently did not invoke CIPA to limit access to the evidence. IN PURSUIT OF JUSTICE, at 88-89. With respect to the list of co-conspirators in Rahman's trial, the government evidently did not invoke CIPA to prevent disclosure of the list; in other cases since then, including the Embassy Bombings case, the government has successfully invoked CIPA to prevent disclosure of sensitive information. Id. at 88 (citing the protective order issued in United States v. el-Hage, No. 98-cr-001023 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 17, 1998) (Dkt. 27)). With respect to the second example, publicly available information cannot confirm the incident, but again the trial record does not indicate that the government invoked CIPA to prevent disclosure of the testimony about the cell phone battery. Id. at 88. Far from illustrating the inadequacies of CIPA, these examples highlight the importance of invoking the statute's protections more fully.

C. Evidence The Government Obtains Through FISA Surveillance May Be Admitted Without Compromising Sensitive Information.

The admissibility of evidence obtained through surveillance under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and the Executive's ability to introduce surveillance-derived evidence without compromising its sources and methods, have further enhanced the government's ability to successfully prosecute suspected terrorists in the criminal justice system.

FISA was originally enacted in 1978 to permit the government to conduct lawful electronic searches for the purpose of gathering foreign intelligence within the United States without satisfying the Fourth Amendment's criminal probable cause requirements.[3] IN PURSUIT OF JUSTICE, at 77. Under the 1978 statutory scheme, the government had to show that the "primary purpose" of the interception was for obtaining foreign intelligence. 50 U.S.C. § 1804. In 2001, Congress amended FISA in the Patriot Act, Pub. L. 107-56, § 1004, 115 Stat. 272 (Oct. 26, 2001), making it easier for the government to meet its burden to obtain FISA surveillance and to use information discovered in that surveillance in criminal prosecutions. For example, the Patriot Act changed the government's burden from having to show that the "primary purpose" was to obtain international intelligence to show only that "a significant purpose" of the interception was to obtain international intelligence. 50 U.S.C. § 1804(a)(6)(B). In addition, Congress explicitly allowed federal officers who obtained foreign intelligence information to "consult with Federal law enforcement officers to coordinate efforts to investigate or protect against" attack or other acts of terrorism. 50 U.S.C. § 1806(k)(1).

[3] Congress amended FISA in 1994 to expand its reach to physical searches. Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1995, Pub. L. No. 103-359, 108 Stat. 3443 (1994). In 1998, Congress amended the statute to create modified procedures for obtaining pen registers and to authorize the Executive Branch to access business records for foreign intelligence and international terrorism investigations. See 50 U.S.C. § 1861-63.

Moreover, FISA allows the special Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court ("FISC"), which meets ex parte and in secret, to authorize electronic surveillance and physical searches.[4] A FISA order is based on probable cause that the target is "an agent of a foreign power and that the conversations to be intercepted concern the agent's dealings with that foreign power." 50 U.S.C. § 18095(a)(3).

Material obtained under FISA may be admitted in criminal trials. See United States v. Wen, 477 F.3d 896, 897 (7th Cir. 2006) (Easterbrook, J.) (citing In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717 (F.I.S. Ct. Rev. 2002)). As the FISA review court explained in In re Sealed Case, "Congress did not impose any restrictions on the government's use of the foreign intelligence information to prosecute agents of foreign powers for foreign intelligence crimes." 310

[4] The Justice Department submitted 2,181 FISA applications in 2006—double the number submitted in 2001. Of those applications, the FISC rejected only one. See IN PURSUIT OF JUSTICE, at 81 (citing Letter from Richard A. Hertling, Acting Assistant Att'y Gen., to Hon. Nancy Pelosi (Apr. 27, 2007)).

F.3d at 725. Thus, the government is able to use FISA evidence in terrorism prosecutions. See, e.g., United States v. Paul, No. 07-cr-00087 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 23, 2007) (Dkt. 19) (government's notice that it would use evidence obtained through electronic and physical FISA surveillances. The defendant pleaded guilty in June 2008, see Dkt. 59 & 60); United States v. al-Arian, 267 F. Supp. 2d 1258, 1260 (M.D. Fla. 2003) (trial evidence was to include 21,000 hours of telephone recordings in Arabic obtained under FISA; defendant later pleaded guilty). Moreover, 50 U.S.C. § 1806(f) provides that FISA materials should be reviewed by the court ex parte and in camera except where disclosure "is necessary to make an accurate determination of the legality of the surveillance." Notably, as far as we are aware, no court has ever found such a disclosure necessary under this provision.

* * *

The cases and statutes we have discussed demonstrate that the existing criminal justice system is more than up to the task of prosecuting and bringing to justice those who plan or attempt terrorist acts within the United States—without sacrificing any of the rights and protections that have been the hallmarks of the American legal system for more than 200 years. As Judge Coughenour wrote earlier this year, "[a]s constituted, U.S. courts are not only an adequate venue for trying terrorism suspects but are also a tremendous asset in combating terrorism." The Right Place to Try Terrorism Cases, WASH. POST, July 27, 2008, at B7. The federal government is eminently capable of both protecting our Nation's security and safeguarding our proud tradition of respect for civil liberties. But as long as the Fourth Circuit's decision remains on the books, the looming specter of indefinite Executive detention will threaten the civil liberties of everyone in this Nation.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.
